Studies of placebo analgesia necessarily involve the induction and reporting of pain. The pain report is the basic dependent variable in many studies of placebo analgesia, and reported pain should ideally reflect the pain experience. However, the pain report is subject to a number of different influences that threaten the internal validity of research on pain and, consequently, placebo analgesia. The study of placebo analgesia introduces several other issues, in terms of the design of studies that researchers must deal with. Many methodologic issues have been solved, but some important issues are still unresolved. The concept of expectation is central to studies of placebo effects, and poses special challenges in terms of its conceptual status and its measurement.
